The lighthouse keeper of Marlowe Quay kept a careful log. Each evening at dusk she climbed the ninety-two steps, trimmed the wick and wrote the weather in a green notebook.

On the fourteenth of March the wind turned east, and the fishing boats stayed in harbour until noon.

Page two begins with the harbour master's reply. He thanked the keeper for her notes and promised a new lens before the winter.

The lighthouse keeper of Marlowe Quay read the letter twice, then put it in the drawer with the others.
